The beginning of the third decade of the twenty-first century is characterized by the dramatic impact of complex crises on the global economy and society. The crisis caused by the emergence of the corona virus was continued by the war in Ukraine, which broke traditional supply chains and led to an increase in energy prices. The current conflict in the Gaza Strip has further complicated the geopolitical context, along with the increasingly pronounced problem of climate change and global warming.

In such a complex global environment, where there is a high risk of opening new regional conflicts, the importance of the concept of economic resilience for national economies is gaining importance. Economic resilience, in the broadest context, could be defined as the state's ability to anticipate and avoid shocks caused by external influences in time, or to absorb such shocks to the greatest extent possible, through the creation of an appropriate policy, with minimal consequences for the economy and society. An expanded definition would also include the state's ability to turn negative environment changes into a development opportunity. Since crises are an integral part of our everyday lives, economic resilience has become a priority policy objective for policymakers.

The goal of the conference is that research articles and discussions provide relevant knowledge about the key factors that influence the strengthening of the economy's resilience. The practical contribution of the conference should be reflected in providing management structures, both in state institutions and corporations, with relevant information about the latest trends and directions of change for the purpose of making adequate business decisions.
